something to comment on (preferably, in a smart way), then think of a question or two? Then, they wrote back... And we have to do it again. And again. And again. Wiser comments, more unique questions – all so that we stand out. I'm a kid, but I'm not. As we all know, in all online and dating apps, there is a lot of competition in each. Many. Actually, don't even think about all the competitions, or you might want to delete all your apps now. And, in fact, it only takes one. One man. Simple. But, to find that one person, you have to stand out. You need to send more messages and questions of one type, so that when he scrolls through the phone they show their BFF profile and your wittism, you will get a stamp of approval. You will be separated for your original message and witty banter, and for not doing any of the things below. Recently, Hinge data scientists analyzed 5,000 Tangel users who exchanged numbers within 24 hours of matching. Then, they used a text analysis model to identify common phrases and words. When someone uses an apology in their opener, they are 56 percent less likely to exchange numbers. Yes, fifty-six percent! Sorry it could be from a message like, Sorry it took me a while to get back to you... So, no apologies! Assertive-you're just out here on out! Here are some other things to avoid in your online convoy:1. Don't Tell HeyIn another study, Hinge conducted a study on opening lines that users would use. Copywriters and their data analysts wrote more than 100 original openers (which vary in subject matter, structure, and length). Then, 22 percent of Tangel users received a variety of conversation starters to choose from. Guess which one received the least number of responses? yes, nice old-fashioned hey. All other openers did better, including, Katy Perry or Taylor Swift. Hello, Hi, and 'Hey also didn't fared well on OkCupid. When they analyzed more than 500,000 first contacts in OKC, they looked at keywords and phrases. It's smarter not to use traditional greetings at all (which gives you a reply rate of 27 percent) and just dive into whatever you say than to start with hi, their blog findings report. Online Dating Coach Laurie Davis, CEO of eFlirt Expert and author of Love at First Click, agrees. told Women's Health, Never say 'hi!' That's too relaxing for someone you've never met before! Instead, he suggested making a statement and asking questions. Don't Use Non-KataMsgs wit por spelin r relly hard 2 reed, says this EliteSingles post. The same applies to recipients of your messages. This is why hard-to-read and misspelled messages can only be badly bad The quickest way to make your message easier to read is to avoid drastically shortened words – write 'are' instead of 'r' for example... A quick spelling check doesn't hurt either – not using a lot of things can get you more attention! Okay, let's stop here. How many of you are getting messages like this?! The Guardian's Soulmates Blog conceded. The words (if you can call it that) you, r, u, yes, cant, hit, really, luv, and wat, are the top nine worst words to use in a greeting. Letters containing these words will practically get no reply, proving that intelligence (or perhaps just good grammar) is an interesting trait in both sexes. OkCupid's research agrees. People who use bad grammar, poor spelling, and non-words fared worse than others and received only an average reply rate of 32 percent. I'm really surprised it's that high. When users write don't and won't, response rates rise to 36 and 37 percent.3. Don't Ask QuestionsNo one starts a conversation faster than a question, so do yourself a big favor and just ask one, says Soulmates Blog The Guardian. I know this isn't a marketing school but, like marketers, you're trying to pull someone in and just like an ad agency that does a call to action, you can, too, just by asking about an interest or even suggesting a dinner date. Our subconscious tells us that it's not polite not to answer questions so your chances increase tenfold just by asking. I agree. How many times have you gotten a message from someone, but they didn't ask you anything? So you ask them something (and also comment on one of their pictures or interests that you share). Still... What. Is it so hard?! I think asking questions is a win-win. How else do you know someone? And if he doesn't ask the question now, imagine how the date will go... 4. Don't Write the Same Message To EveryoneKatie Heaney wrote a piece for The Atlantic on How not to Write Online Dating Messages. In it, he talks about The Virus, a message cut and pasted. What I didn't prepare was copy-pasters, virus transmitters, people who seemed to send identical (or softly mutated versions thereof) to the owners of every female profile they could find. Not only did they read as if they were cut-and-pasted, but his friends received the same message from the same person. End of story. The EliteSingles blog warns of the same problem. To make the best impression when dating online, the first message thus needs to be genuine: it's about making the recipient feel special, says Sophie Watson.5. Avoid Compliments words like sexy and pretty, in the welcome message, choose the one that is as amazing and cool, said OkCupid about the same study I mentioned above. As we all know, people usually like compliments, but when they are used as a pick-up line, before you even meet in person, they definitely feel... ew, said Christian Rudder of OKC. How About We recommend the same in one of their Dates Article. Don't start with 'I think you're very pretty, says How About We's Chiara Atik. ... Especially online, when women may be a little more alert, opening with comments about their physical appearance risks looking superficial and off-putting. 6. Don't Be Negative Remember that you are here to sell yourself, so instead of illustrating why someone might not be sending you a message back, think like a salesperson and show off your best side, says the blog EliteSingles. There's really nothing to add to this one, right? I know I read messages from people with self-deprecating humor, but when they're strangers, it's not funny. On the contrary, I tend to think low-self-esteem.7. Don't Say PleaseYa, please show up as getting a very low response rate for OKC users... when men use it. It received a reply rate of 22 percent, and in fact it is the only word that is actually worse for you than its Netspeak equivalent (23 percent), Rudder said. I just did a quick scan of my last dozen online messages and, of course, there were some help there: Please let me know, Please come back to me, and please write back. If you think about it, if we become someone, we'll go back to them without trial, thank you. Want more Coverage of Sex and Relationships Bustle? Picture: Fotolia; Giphy; Hinge Lafazi Publications Last summer, we discussed the best apps for reading lovers, and now we do the same for lovers of words. Actually, to enjoy some of the apps below, you don't need to be a vocab wonk. An excellent word-focused suite of apps runs from cheerful (Word a Day) to scientific (dictionary apps). Below, find our four favorites. 1. &Picture; Audio Word A Day ($1.99). The title of this app tells its story. Every day, the app gives you a new word. Most of those words are common —like my current words, nirvana—making this app perfect for refreshing you on words you've read dozens of times but whose definitions, for whatever reason are somewhat vague. Brightly colored cartoons give life to every definition, a useful memento that tends to give you an edge in remembering the word. For nirvana, a beaming man is kicked back in a hammock suspended from just two palm trees growing on a desert island, and you can almost hear the songs playing from his bedside radio. In this app, you can take a quiz of the past words of the day. Also, bookmark favorites in the alphabetical list. 2. 7 Small Words (Free). If you're a fan of word games thinking like crossword puzzles, Scrabble, and Scattergories, you'll love 7 Little Words. After playing the first game, you will quickly play ten more. This app is a lot of fun. Each puzzle consists of seven clues, crossword style instructions on the word you have to guess from the scrambled mail bank (DE, RR, OTS, etc.) at the bottom of the bottom Next to each clue is a second clue: the number of letters in a mystery word. For your first word, you might be primed with something like a chess piece and six letters. After some quick thinking, you'll collect KN, IG, and HT for knights. It seems simple, but some clues are really annoying, especially those in the more challenging puzzles of the day. In fact, if you can think of a word for a 7 letter hint and a boot strap, please post it in the comments section below. 3. Textropolis (Free). This unique app challenges you to find all the words you can possibly create from rearranging letters that spell out the name of the world's cities. This is an anagram game of sorts, just not all the letters of the initial word should be used. Each city is a level game. You start with Kingstown, a town in St. Vincent. The object is to find 95 words that can be hung together using the letters k, i, n, g, s, t, o, w, and n. On your device's screen is an animated version of Kingstown, the horizon that displays, to begin with, just one palm tree. First, you'll probably see the king, then maybe a twig. Type the appropriate letter, press send, and above a single tree the plane will fly, dragging a banner that shares details about the word you find. Enter into the words and the building. Get all 95, and you'll build Kingstown, Edinburgh, Santa Rosa, or any city whose letters you've reordered. You'll learn new words on the way to finding them all, and chances are many of these words will be short races and packing punches, like wonk. 4. American Heritage Dictionary ($24.99). If you've read so far in a post about the best apps for word nerds, you'll probably feel it's worth parting ways with Jackson and Lincoln to have the best word lovers app. We learn new words, mostly, from the different definitions listed next to them in the dictionary. The more precise this definition is, the more airtight and clear our understanding of the words they define. The remarkable American Heritage Dictionary offers trimmed, forward-thinking definitions that take into account how words change. From the expert panel, you get instructions on how to use words. You can also group words into folders or check the history of words you've seen. This is a new version of the time-tested tool to make familiar foreign words. But if a more casual app is more of a thing of yours, stick to the three listed above.
